Flesh eating ants could be chewing you up in searing, excruciating bites. You could have some rare disease that causes your insides to liquefy and pour out of your ears. Nevertheless, you have reached the absolute zero of your misery. You are in the library and your world is continuing on merrily without you, while you study under the flickering neon lights.

These are not exotic adventures you are missing. Maybe your wife is putting your kids to bed. Or your girlfriends are having sushi night without you, again. Maybe what you are really missing is the chance to scrub your kitchen floor. And yet you feel a terrible longing, homesickness for your own life, for comfort, fluency, and confidence. You wonder- is it worth it?

And by this I mean to say- Welcome to law school.

I am sure that in the last few months, your news of enrolling in law school has been met by several slightly demoralizing responses.

People asked you, "Isn't that supposed to be really hard?" They told you what happened to their cousin, or sister-in-law, or next-door neighbor. Law school and wisdom tooth removal inspire an insidious desire in people to share their worst stories.

The fact is, many of those stories are true, and some will resonate with you in a painful way in the next months. You will find yourself having to give up things that bring you happiness and security; you will do so contending with the fact that you will likely work harder and see fewer positive results than you ever have in your life. Your friends from before you came to school may have a hard time understanding your choice to do work when you could be with them. Your romantic partner will share the burden of this experience in many ways, and support from him or her will not only be crucial, it will be tested. You will see your families less than you'd like, and you will give up the chance to do some things that will become dear memories for them.

There are some pieces of advice I would like to offer.

1. Don't hold the students who impress you on too high a pedestal, and don't discount anyone. The students you compare yourself to, coming up short, will reveal their humanity in time. You will feel foolish for being too hard on yourself while they were imperfect all along. You may also kick yourself for not having been open to someone who is a wonderful friend. On the other hand, no matter how self-indulgent the use of class time, or inane the question, some of your least obviously impressive classmates will knock your socks off.

2. Allow yourself to make some dear friends. Your new friends at school will understand your life like no one else you know will. They will share the same burdens and likely participate in the kind of hifalutin' law talk that you'll discover you thrive on. They will see you fighting back tears, laughing your hardest, and consuming exorbitant amounts of caffeine and terribly fattening foods. You will come to know them during finals as well as you know some of your oldest friends. They will help reflect back to you the bright, passionate, endearing person you are, as opposed to the stupid, neurotic, failure you feel you are.

3. Always remember what you are doing here. You are earning the right to advocate for people's families, finances, businesses, and rights. You are becoming someone who can ameliorate disaster, bring justice to inequity, make crucial business decisions, and participate in the shaping of the law. Law school ought to be really hard.

All this said, you will likely find that you belong here. I imagine it is an experience not unlike motherhood, or the presidency-grueling and exhausting, and worth every hot minute. ***

Tales of Study Abroad from Ireland...

William Mitchell offers several summer study abroad programs; Trish Gabriel shares her stories from the school's program in Galway, Ireland.

Top of the Summer to Ya!

By Trish Gabriel

Sixty degrees, rainy, cold; a recipe for a perfect summer vacation, right? It depends. I spent my summer abroad in Galway, Ireland, during the coldest and rainiest summer they had experienced in years. It rained at least six days a week, for six weeks straight. Needless to say, that is not what most people would pick as an ideal way to spend the summer months, especially when they live in a state that is cold the majority of the year.

However, the rain does not stop the Irish and, like a true Minnesotan, I also learned to deal with the rain. I would bundle up, put on my wellies, and explore. I was grateful that I did not let rain get in the way experiencing Galway because it is such a fascinating city.

Galway is located on the western side of Ireland, with a population of about 70,000 people. It is a city full of history and full of life. At any point in the day I could wander down Quay (pronounced Key) Street and see people meandering through the shops, or I would wander down the coast of Galway Bay to Salthill and even in the coldest of temperatures see people swimming. After the shops had closed up and day moved into night, I would see fisherman standing in the frigid water of the Corrib River fishing for Salmon and other local fish. There was always something new to see, a street to wander down, people to meet.

The Galway Waterfront

Not only did I get to experience Galway while in Ireland, but as a group we also went on day trips around the Galway area. We traveled across Galway Bay to the Aran Islands, which has spectacular views of the Atlantic Ocean, along with ancient ruins and small quaint farms where farmers are willing to spark up a conversation as you bike along. We traveled by bus to the Cliffs of Moher, which are impressive 700 feet cliffs overlooking the ocean. Additionally, we went to Dublin, where I got a taste of the world both James Joyce and Oscar Wilde experienced, and a taste of the world Arthur Guinness developed in 1759.

Even though I did travel quite a bit while in Ireland, I did stay in Corrib Village (the dorm-like apartments we lived in while attending the National University of Ireland) during the week. By staying at home, there are some interesting tidbits about modern Irish culture you do learn while doing basic everyday things in Galway. When you flip on the television, at any time of the day, you can find syndicated episodes of “Friends” and “Newlyweds”. The idea of Jessica Simpson and Nick Lachey still being a couple on Irish MTV was interesting because the fascination with that couple in the US ended when they got divorced. Additionally, by going to the grocery store, you find out some American products have made it across the pond. Special K, Corn Flakes, and Campbell’s have arrived in Ireland. Marshmallow cereal, for example Lucky Charms, on the other hand has not. That made a 24-hour final a bit difficult for those of us who have learned to stay awake by eating highly sugared cereal.

So the answer to the question posed in the first paragraph is yes. In the end, the rain was worth it. The cold was worth it. The experience of being abroad, seeing how different cultures live and experiencing the daily routine in a foreign country is always worth it. However, the irony of the situation is that as I sit here, my last week in Ireland, typing this article, it is sunny, and there is not a cloud in the sky. ***

Focus on Practice: Elder Law

This year, The Opinion will examine several types of practice areas; the first is elder law, described by Allison Crandall who worked in the field this summer.

Fighting for Granny

By Allison Crandall

Close your eyes and picture an older person who is dear to you. Now imagine them competing on American Gladiator. In order to defend their life’s work, they must go head to head with Gladiators in the form of illness or injury, limited access to health care, abusive treatment by caregivers, financial instability, inadequate access to representation, and issues of lost autonomy. Imagine them darting from cover to cover, or swinging with all of their might to win the jousting match. Although it seems silly to picture your great-aunt Bernice going head to head with Storm, she has much to protect and much to protect it against.

We would all love for the older people in our lives to live their last years with gusto, surrounded by love and full of interest about a world they now have time to more deeply investigate. It would be wonderful for those dear to us to spend those years with their life partner, protected from the deep pain of loss and the disorientation of a foreign solitude. No one wants to imagine entrusting a beloved friend or family member to a facility only to have that person exploited, ignored, or abused. However much we might prefer not to think of it, the end of one's life is inevitable. Of the paths that can lead to that end, many are difficult.

Elder law is an area of law that focuses on the obstacles presented to older people in the course of their efforts to maximize their later years. Practitioners of this area of law deal with issues of employment, retirement, housing, estate and trust planning, health care directives, public benefits such as Medicaid, and surrogate decision-making such as power of attorney. In helping clients deal with these issues, elder law attorneys must also take into account the physical and mental vulnerabilities that the client may be experiencing. Older people often find themselves as vulnerable as they've been since they were children due to physical limitations, and in many cases that is exacerbated by dementia or Alzheimer's. These changes in a person's autonomy create opportunities for exploitation and abuse. Attorneys in this field must also be aware of the complicated emotional issues involved for family members privy to decisions about a parent's death, declining health, or estate.

Between 2005 and 2025, the number of people over 65 years old or older will have nearly doubled in Minnesota. This dramatic increase will need to met by support in the form of access and representation. In those twenty years, medical technology will likely continue to create innovations that prolong lives, complicating the questions people and their families face. Problems that exist today in the management of care, particularly communications between state agencies and law enforcement, will only worsen as the population grows unless new legislation is drafted or new policies are enforced. The future of social programs such as Social Security and Medicaid are topics of national debate, and important means by which voters evaluate candidates. The obstacles facing older people are issues that concern all of us, and their intricacies will continue to grow with time.

At the risk of sounding cheeky, it seems fair to say that only those who plan to live forever can avoid thoughts of getting old. With the boom of senior citizens in this country, America will have to face some realities about how we value older people. Consciousness of elder abuse is about thirty years behind domestic abuse and child abuse. Many people treat the situations encountered by older people with a dismissive attitude, as if having lived a good and productive life should be satisfaction enough in the face of abuse or exploitation. This area of law is emerging as a crucial part of shaping the structure of America to reflect a commitment to dignity and respect for the aged.

Opinions from Study Abroad: Turkish Politics

William Mitchell has had an ongoing relationship with Bahcesehir University since 2002. Justin Paul shares his observations of developments in Turkish politics he witnessed while in Istanbul this summer.

A New Turkish Electoral Reality

By Justin Paul

Election campaigning was intense this past July in Istanbul and all over Turkey. Merely going from my hotel to Bahcesehir University I would see dozens of vans playing patriotic music and shilling for their party. Despite the fierce campaigning, the results were far from close. The ruling Justice and Development party (AKP) increased its share of seats by going from 33 percent of the vote to nearly 48 percent. The AKP has faced strong criticism from the Kemalist establishment, which fears the party's Islamist origins. However, there is evidence that the AKP had made a clear break from its more radical past, when it had a different name and different leadership (then called the Welfare Party).

The party that represents the harder wing of the movement that bore the AKP – Felicity Party—only won three percent of the vote. The last five years of AKP rule have seen fairly stable economic growth, a series of reforms to meet EU standards and fairly healthy ties with Washington DC, despite the fallout preceding the Iraq war. The AKP knows that more EU standards mean more freedom of religion in a state whose laic tradition has kept religious authorities under state supervision.

Of course, the AKP has done a few things which made the secular elites in Turkey uneasy. It led an aborted drive to criminalize adultery and has hinted at times of wanting to repeal the headscarf ban in universities and government offices. Most recently their effort to make foreign minister Abdullah Gul president drew anger and millions in protest. While there is some merit in worrying about a party that has all levers of power in its hand, it was equally true that the fact that Gul's wife wore a headscarf was a problem for the many hundreds of thousands that protest. The automatic assumption that anyone who wishes to wear a scarf is automatically a tool of radical Islam is a false premise indulged in by many die hard secularists.

While some accuse the AKP of a hidden agenda, its policies could not be more different from the previous incarnations of Islamist parties in Turkey. Indeed when compared to its opponents, the AKP by far looks like the more worldly and modern party. AKP actually purged a segment of its national view (a religious political movement) candidates for this election in favor of more centrist candidates.

The main opposition—the Republican Peoples Party (CHP)—has been in steady retreat from its alleged social democratic principles. Its leader, Deniz Baykal, has embarked on a series of nationalist policy planks, including denying that there were sub-identities in Turkish society; in particular, this is not a true reflection of the Kurdish region. It is the CHP, not the AKP, that has been irrationally attacking foreign investment and peddling conspiracy theories about the west as well as trying to use the EU as a tool to weaken Turkey. Baykal also hurt his party's cause by backing a memorandum from Turkey's staunchly secular army that was seen as meddling in the later aborted presidential election back in April. As a result, prominent Turkish journalists like Mustafa Akyol have juxtaposed the modernizing trends within Turkish moderate Muslim movements to the increasing hostility to the west from many die-hard secularists who favor state control of the economy.

The election also produced 14 percent of the vote for the Nationalist Movement Party (MHP). The MHP is an ultra nationalist party known for its hawkish positions against Kurdish separatism and anti-European Union positions. Its success was in large part due to alienation from the United States and EU because of their perceived support for PKK operatives and television stations. With a revamped parliamentary crew that includes some former ambassadors, the MHP could be the king-maker in parliament. Whilst this party's success shows a rise of ultra-nationalism in some quarters, it does not reflect a majority viewpoint.. Ninety-one percent of Turks might not like American policy but 48 percent voted for the one party accused by nationalists for being American puppets.

The success of Kurdish independents in the southeast of the country and in major cities like Istanbul will allow for new chance for deputies with different point of view to speak in parliament. Still, the fact that the AKP got as many votes as these independents in hotbeds of Kurdish nationalism shows that the ruling party can reach out to voters in Turkey's southeast far more effectively than any of the more established parties. In the past, members of Kurdish nationalist persuasion were mouthpieces for PKK terrorism or were other deliberately provocative (such as trying to swear an oath in Kurdish). They will need to be more careful this time as their views will be easily relegated if they indulge in politician by day and gunman by night doublespeak. This parliament is a real chance to show what the AKP can do to make good on their promises of reform.

If they abuse this power and give into the more reactionary elements of their party they will polarize Turkish society further. However, there is reason to believe that they will continue to indulge in a more moderate path. This also gives the opportunity for the CHP to redefine itself and to become an effective opposition that may actually reflect the social democratic views in which a large segment of its voters believe. AKP will be challenged with finding a less polarizing presidential candidate – facing down those accuse them of being weak on terrorism-- and with balancing its religious base with its new swath of centrist supporters. The secularist versus Islamist battle line may do well in the writings of Islamo-phobic bigots, but it does not reflect the nuances of the Turkish electoral reality. The long term goals of AKP are still being revealed, but the party has a tremendous burden on its shoulders after this landmark election. ***

The William Mitchell History Quiz:

Learn a little about the place where your greatest fears will be realized...

Fact or fiction? Test your knowledge of William Mitchell and its history...

1. William Mitchell is the product of a merger between the St. Paul College of Law and the Minneapolis-Minnesota College of Law.
2. A cigar-smoking gent called John Hervey, who has been called “an iron hand in a velvet glove,” played an important part in guiding William Mitchell into existence.
3. The school is named after a famous Minnesota Supreme Court Justice, and not, as some mistakenly assume, after famous World War I pilot “Billy Mitchell.”
4. Our school's namesake was born in Canada.
5. When Dean Stephen R. Curtis became dean in 1958, he encouraged students to form a newspaper.
6. Because of cramped space, the school rented classrooms from St. Thomas.

7. Classes were first held in the school's current building in 1976.
8. The first female Minnesota Supreme Court Justice, Rosalie Wahl, is a graduate.
9. Former Chief Justice Warren Burger graduated from St. Paul College of Law in 1931 and returned to dedicate William Mitchell's library in 1990.
10. Nuns operated a private Catholic girls' high school in the building until early 1970s. Its motto was “a lily among the thorns.”

Cheney Asserts Executive Privilege Against Bush: Refuses to Give Bush Libby's Address

By Nick Brozek

Last Tuesday President Bush personally phoned Vice President Dick Cheney to ask him for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's home address so he could mail him an official pardon. Cheney declined to release this information to the President, asserting the doctrine of executive privilege. This created a stir among Washington insiders, as it is thought to be the first time executive privilege has been claimed against the president of the United States.

When approached for comment Vice President Cheney informed this reporter that any action of the executive branch, or by any non-executive branch, or by any executive-esque branch of the government is none of mine or any other sentient beings business and that "the existence of the media helps the terrorists, except for Fox News."

Some in Washington, even those who support Cheney's action, have been left wondering why, in this case, Cheney didn't simply hand over the information to President Bush, since withholding this information seems only to hurt Cheney's former aid Libby. When asked by reporters why he wasn't taking advantage of this opportunity to help Libby, Cheney responded, "Who?"

Conservative pundit and talk show host Bill O'Reilly, on his show The O'Reilly Factor, stated his support for the Vice President's action, saying, "Cheney is standing up for the values of this country. The liberals have been trampling all over the doctrine of executive privilege for far too long. In a democracy, there are some things people just don't need to know, such as what the executive branch is doing."

Tucker Carlson also defended Cheney's action, and claimed that the liberals should have seen it coming. "[Cheney] has already both claimed not to be a part of the executive branch, and asserted executive privilege in order to avoid oversight of his office. Asserting executive privilege against the president is simply the next illogical step."

Surprisingly, President Bush has also voiced his support for Cheney's assertion of executive privilege against him. While addressing members of the armed services at Charleston Air Force Base in Charleston, South Carolina, Bush said that he fully supports the Vice President and said that he is doing a "great job." Bush went on to say, "If only more people, such as congressmen, had the courage to stand up to me the country would be a much better place."

CNN's Wolf Blitzer invited Vice President Cheney to explain his recent actions in a televised interview, which aired last night. During the interview Blitzer addressed Cheney as "Mr. Vice President" and asked him how he was holding up under the strain of the controversy. Cheney did not respond to this query and Blitzer, thinking he had not heard, repeated the greeting. When Cheney again failed to respond, Blitzer asked him if anything was wrong, to which Cheney responded that, under the doctrine of executive privilege, he was not required to disclose whether or not he is the Vice President. When Blitzer pointed out that Cheney must be the vice president, since if he was not then he had no right to assert executive privilege, Cheney accused Blitzer of helping Al-Qaeda and the group's leader, Saddam Hussein. When Blitzer asked if he meant Osama bin Laden, Cheney replied “Wolf, I already told you I’m not going to answer that question.” Blitzer seemed somewhat discomfited by this; the following 55 minutes of the interview are thought to be the longest period of televised silence in the history of cable television.

Finally Blitzer signaled the end of the segment by bidding goodnight to his audience and announcing the topic for today’s show: journalist Robert Novak’s recent article revealing I. Lewis “Scooter” Libby’s home address. ***

The William Mitchell Life Coach: it’s this guy➔

Dear William Mitchell Life Coach,

I am a quiet, shy girl who has trouble finding men. What can I do to be more charismatic?

XOXO, Surly

Thank you for the letter; please allow me to be your all knowing guide to the labyrinth that is the male psyche. Right now, you are just a wee turtle, lost in the sewer. By following these three steps, like a wee turtle rolling into a liquid mutagen, you will turn into a Ninja Turtle.... of love.

First, guys like outgoing girls. There are scientific studies showing this; seriously, look it up.¹ You see, men have self-destructive personalities. That’s why they enjoy things such as: sword fighting, fire dancing and deep sea welding. Instead of going on a snore-fest date that involves dinner and a movie, enroll yourselves in matador classes, or, if he has an aversion to ritual animal slaughter, take him to eat at the Waffle House. This shows that you are outgoing, spunky and love the thrill of near death encounters as much as he does.

Second, you must not be afraid to take charge. You know the old saying: “nice guys finish last”? There’s an older saying that says: “nice girls finish laster.”² On your first date, be at least 30 minutes late. If he complains, explain to him that time is merely an abstraction of sequential relations that leads to a certain event. If he complains further, tell him to go to hell. At this point you will have established your dominance and become the alpha male of the relationship.³

Finally, you must be spontaneous. Now, I don’t even know if I should to tell you this. This move is so devastating to males it may bring about the downfall of the relationship structure as we know it, but oh well, I was getting way too much play anyway. Here’s what you do: find a guy you like and just start making out with him. When I say “make out” I mean reckless, full-on tongue. Most women are like leopards, silently stalking their prey until WHAM, they pounce. In reality, women should act like rabid bull elephants, carelessly and indiscriminately destroying everything in their paths.⁴ I have recommended this to many people⁵ and it has worked every time.⁶ I don’t know why this has not caught on, but, as with the theory of relativity, it may take people a long time to put two and two together even on the simplest things.

If you follow these three easy steps, I guarantee men will flock to you like a pack of lions at a wounded zebra conference.⁷

³ Except a chick.

Leading the Way in Technology

By Adam T. Johnson

Those William Mitchell students with an eye for personal injury law have much cause for enthusiasm this fall. In its push to remain at the forefront of employing technology to enhance the practical side of legal education and to boost the college's future endowment, the William Mitchell Office of Career and Professional Development announced its purchase of the recently completed Boeing Tactical On-road Readiness Training simulator (TORT). William Mitchell joins a list of only nine institutions to boast such a machine; other owners include the Institute for Advanced Denim Studies and Research, Tom Cruise, France, and the Law Office of Sampson McBrass, P.A. (still going strong in its small corner of Beavis Marks, London since the times of The Old Curiosity Shop).

Similar in many respects to Boeing's several flight simulators, the TORT simulator prepares its student participants for the countless obstacles and hazards inherent to traveling to the scene of an accident or during the actual pursuit of an ambulance. Complete with all the interior instruments and functions of an automobile, a large projection screen situated in place of a windshield allows students to perform under a multiplicity of weather environments and varying degrees of traffic conditions. An onboard global positioning system (GPS) alerts the student to the location of the accident and provides a map, complete with voice command, of the most expedient and least congested route to the scene. Additional functions beyond the GPS include a dashboard camera for obtaining evidence and potential witnesses, an onboard printer able to provide customized on-site retainer agreements, and driver and passenger side projectile ports able to fire blood-seeking, business-card carrying "soft impact" missiles.

"It's not that we're teaching students to become ambulance chasers." said a spokesman for the American Association of Justice (AAJ), the former Association of Trial Lawyers of America (ATLA). "We responded to a very real concern that many students entering personal injury practice are ill-prepared when it comes to securing new clients. Our funding for the simulator was made out of a concern for public safety, nothing more, nothing more I assure you." It should be noted that your humble writer witnessed the small twinkle of a dollar sign apparition in the spokesman's eye upon uttering the words "nothing more".

Yet critics of TORT don't see things the same way. "This is indeed disagreeable. It doesn't sit well with one's constitution." said Congressman Sir Mulberry Hawk (R-Nebraska), a champion of tort reform and professional archer (he boasts nine medals in seven states). "This simulator encourages aspiring lawyers to become sociopathic vultures...I have not been so enraged since I learned 'News Radio' would not be making its way to DVD." (It is now available, and rest assured this journalist made the Congressman privy to such. The origins of the Congressman's knighthood are still under investigation).

When asked for their opinions, a vast majority of William Mitchell students were excited about the college's acquisition. Concededly, the polling was conducted at Billy's at 1:00 a.m. after a good deal of the port, and the empirical precision of this journalist is certainly subject to speculation.

HOROSCOPES

By resident gypsy Irina Abramovich

Aries (March 21 – April 19): Even though the 161 you got on your LSAT did not get you into the U, you will take great solace in the fact that while U students discuss the niceties of jurisprudence you will learn how to, you know, practice the f-ing law.

Taurus (April 20 – May 20): You will make an awkward first impression on your peers when you get drunk and dump the front desk candy bowl into your pants.

Gemini (May 21 – June 21): You will gain first-hand experience with temporary restraining orders when you write to your favorite federal judge and ask for a lock of hair, a vial of blood, a specimen sample of his reproductive material and a signed, glossy 8 X 10 photograph from Glamour Shots.

Cancer (June 22 – July 22): You will make yourself a Socratic target when you wear a t-shirt to the first day of class that says "The only thing I know is that I know pretty much everything."

Leo (July 23 – August 22): You will incur the wrath of your WRAP professor when you politely suggest to him that if he loves the Bluebook so much he should just marry it.

Virgo (August 23 – September 22): You realize you might not be getting the legal education you're paying for when your law professor, recently diagnosed with schizophrenia, invites you and your classmates to a party he is throwing on the moon.

Libra (September 23 – October 22): No matter how bad things get, you are comforted by remembering that things could always be worse: you could be going to Hamline or you could find yourself being woken up to Bruce Vilanch doing the truffle shuffle over your bed.

Scorpio (October 23 – November 21): Your experience with Torts will become all too real when your clever trick to unplug the defibrillators goes horribly awry.

Sagittarius (November 22 – December 21): Kenneth Culp Davis' treatise on Administrative Law serves a great purpose when you use it to shatter the mandible of the jerk who shushed you in the library.

Capricorn (December 22 – January 19): You experience a profound revelation when you realize the word "arrear" rhymes with "beers." However, you are deeply disappointed when this new found fact does not bring you the fame and honor that you feel you so greatly deserve.

Aquarius (January 20 – February 18): Sure, your St. Thomas counterparts might get into heaven, but at least your law school has been accredited for more than a year, and heaven is totally overrated anyway.

Pisces (February 19 – March 20): You will be confused to find yourself at law school after signing up for what you thought were community ed horseback riding lessons.
